Republican Presidential Primary

RINDGE, NH – With just over half a year before the much anticipated 2008 New Hampshire Presidential Primary, former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney has overtaken Senator John McCain and former mayor Rudy Giuliani as the Republican favorite following the debate on Tuesday, June 5. In March, John McCain (29%) and Rudy Giuliani (28%) were early front-runners, but today Romney commands a nine-point lead over Giuliani (18%) and a 10-point lead over McCain (17%), attracting the support of 27 percent of Republican primary voters in New Hampshire. Giuliani and McCain have dropped 10 points and 12 points in the poll respectively.

Overview

The findings outlined in this report are based on the latest Franklin Pierce University / WBZ Poll, conducted by RKM Research and Communication in collaboration with faculty and student interviewers at Franklin Pierce University. The Franklin Pierce University / WBZ Poll is sponsored by Franklin Pierce University and WBZ. The project represents a collaboration that provides Franklin Pierce University students unique learning opportunities to participate in the polling process and gain real-world experience working with an independent marketing research firm.

Methodology

The poll is based on interviews with 409 likely Republican Presidential Primary voters. All respondents interviewed in this study were part of a fully representative sample. The survey was administered by telephone, June 6, 2007. The survey of 409 respondents has a maximum margin of sampling error of +/- 4.9%.

Are Republican primary voters paying attention?

The answer to this question appears to be an unqualified “yes.” Although early in the primary process, New Hampshire’s Republican primary voters are paying attention to the race. When asked how closely they have followed the 2008 presidential race, 82 percent of Republican primary voters said that they are following the race somewhat (51%) or very (31%) closely. Only 18 percent of likely Republican primary voters said that they have not followed the race that closely.

Republican primary voters were also asked if they watched the debate among Republican presidential hopefuls held on Tuesday evening, June 5th—or if they have read, seen or heard any news stories about the debate.

How many voters watched the debate?

	Exposure to Debate
Watched debate ONLY	27%
BOTH—Watched debate and read, saw or heard news stories	19%
Read, saw or heard stories about the debate in the news	31%
Neither	22%

Overall, many Republican primary voters (46%) watched the debate (which includes those who watched the debate only and those who watched the debate and recall reading, hearing or seeing stories about the debate in the news). In addition, nearly one-third of Republican primary voters (31%) recall reading, hearing or seeing stories about the debate in the news even though they did not watch the debate. Only 22 percent did not watch the debate or read, see or hear any stories about the debate in the news.

Who won the debate?

Among Republican primary voters who watched the debate, or have read, seen or heard stories about the debate in the news, nearly one-fourth (22%) said that Romney won the debate, or performed better than the other candidates in the debate. Eighteen percent of Republican primary voters said that Giuliani won the debate, and 11 percent said that McCain won the debate. Few Republican primary voters felt that another candidate won the debate.

Romney now enjoys strong support among Republican primary voters.

Romney's strong showing in the debate has helped widen his lead in the race for the New Hampshire Republican presidential nomination. If the Republican presidential primary were held today, Romney would receive 27 percent of the vote, compared to 18 percent for Giuliani and 17 percent for McCain. As shown in the table below, Romney's support has increased from 22 to 27 percent in the past three months, while Giuliani's support has dropped from 28 to 18 percent, and McCain's support has dropped from 29 to 17 percent.

In addition, Fred Thompson—who did not participate in the Tuesday debate but did establish an exploratory committee in preparation for a run—is now ranked fourth at nine percent. Other candidates have seen little-to-no positive movement in their support since March.

If the Republican presidential primary election were held today, who would you vote for?

With Fred Thompson in the race, the three leaders see a minor decline in their support.

As of today, Fred Thompson has established an exploratory committee, confirming his intention to run in the 2008 Republican Presidential Primary. With him in the race, Romney loses some of his lead, receiving 27 percent of the vote. Giuliani loses two points of support, with 18 percent of the vote, and McCain loses one point of support, with 17 percent of the vote. These results suggest that Fred Thompson will find support across the board, and his impact on the primary could prove widespread as he pulls votes away from several competitors.

If the Republican presidential primary election were held today, who would you vote for?

	Thompson in the race	Thompson NOT in the race
Mitt Romney	27%	30%
Rudy Giuliani	18%	20%
John McCain	17%	18%
Fred Thompson	9%
Newt Gingrich	3%	5%
Undecided	19%	19%

The debate has improved the favorability ratings of Romney, but not McCain.

It is also interesting to track each candidate's favorability rating in order to better understand how the contest is shaping up over time. In March, Giuliani had the highest net favorability rating at 66 percent, and McCain had the second highest at 63 percent. Romney had a net favorability of 51 percent. Since that time, Romney's net favorability rating increased to 65 percent, while Giuliani's and McCain's fell to 60 percent and 37 percent respectively. Fred Thompson's net favorability (32%) rivals McCain's. Mike Huckabee received a modest improvement in net favorability, up from six percent to 16 percent.

The debate appears to have improved perceptions of Mike Huckabee, but the front runners Romney and Giuliani benefited the most.

Romney and Giuliani, the perceived winners of the debate, both saw significant lifts in favorability among Republican primary voters who watched the debate. Romney's favorability among Republican primary voters is 11 points higher among those who watched the debate (81%) than among those who did not watch the debate (70%). Giuliani also received a similar boost, and Huckabee—the most competitive second-tier candidate—received a 26-point lift in favorability due to the debate. McCain did not receive a significant boost in favorability among respondents who watched the debate. In fact, his unfavorability rating is 13 points higher among those who watched the debate (31%) than among those who did not (18%). This may be due to McCain's repeated defense of immigration reform, a position out-of-step with Republican primary voters.

Giuliani has improved perceptions of his positions on the issues and remains the leader in terms of leadership qualities.

Respondents were asked the reasons why they would vote for their first choice candidate. The results are shown below for the top three Republican candidates.

Which of the following best describes why you would vote for ... ?

	Giuliani		McCain		Romney
	June 4, 2007	March 13, 2007	June 4, 2007	March 13, 2007	June 4, 2007	March 13, 2007

Leadership qualities	42%	58%	16%	20%	24%	26%
Character	5%	10%	26%	17%	18%	24%

Giuliani voters are drawn to his candidacy based on his position on the issues (38%), and his leadership qualities (42%). Romney voters are drawn to his candidacy because of his position on the issues (36%) and his leadership qualities (24%).

McCain has lost ground in terms of his leadership qualities (16%), although perceptions of his character (26%) have improved.

Overall, the results suggest that Romney's current success is due to his more well-rounded appeal across the board in terms of: 1) his positions on the issues; 2) his perceived leadership qualities; 3) his personal character; and 4) his past political experience.

These results suggest that Romney has improved his position among registered Republican primary voters, attracting 82 percent today compared to 76 percent in March. Giuliani, on the other hand, has lost a little support among registered Republicans.

McCain’s position on immigration reform is hurting him with Republican primary voters.

Republican primary voters were asked if they support or oppose the current proposed immigration reform bill. Twenty percent support the bill, 55 percent oppose it and 25 percent are unsure. Among Republican primary voters who oppose the immigration reform bill, only 10 percent would vote for McCain in the primary, compared to 28 percent who support immigration reform. These results suggest that many Republican primary voters are punishing McCain for his position on this issue.

Favorability and primary vote choice for Giuliani, compared by position on immigration reform:

The underlying intangible momentum in this race is working to Romney's advantage, but that could change quickly.

When asked which candidate they think will ultimately win the Republican nomination, 23 percent of identified Romney, up from 12 percent in March. Giuliani, on the other hand, has dropped among Republican primary voters from 28 percent in March to 21 percent today. McCain has dropped from 26 percent in March to 13 percent today. According to R. Kelly Myers, "this difference is an important indication about how Republican primary voters think the race will eventually turn out, and is a useful metric to track each candidate as the presidential primary approaches."

Which candidate do you think will end-up winning the Republican nomination?
